Public Opinion on Forced Internal Displacement and Extraordinary Security Measures in El Salvador

8 out of 10 Salvadorans think the State should recognize forced internal displacement by violence

7 out of 10 Salvadorans think that the restrictions placed on some prisons did little or nothing to reduce crime in the country

5.2% of those surveyed said they had to flee to protect themselves or a family member from a threat or act of violence

According to a public opinion survey carried out by IUDOP (The University Public Opinion Institute of the Universidad Centroamericana), 88.6% of Salvadorans affirmed that the State should recognize the existence of forced internal displacement due to violence. This question was part of a public opinion survey about forced internal displacement due to violence in the country, and public perceptions of the extraordinary security measures implemented by the current Government. The survey sample included 1,806 adults, and is thus representative of Salvadorans 18 years and older who are living in the country. The survey has a sampling error of about 2.3%.

Public Opinion on Forced Displacement due to Violence

The survey explored the topic of forced displacement due to violence through various questions. First, it asked those surveyed if, during the current year, they had changed their place of residence to protect themselves or their family from a threat or act of violence. The results show that 94.8% of those surveyed were not obligated to move, while 5.2% (94 people) reported changing their place of residence to protect themselves from threats or acts of violence.

The group that was forced to move was asked if they had considered moving to another country. Approximately six out of every ten people (63.8%) who were forced to change their place of residence, affirmed that they had considered going to live in another country, while four out of every ten (36.2%) said they had not considered this alternative. When asked what country they had considered moving to, about half (51.8%) indicated that they had considered migrating to the US, 13.3% alluded to migrating to Europe, 8.3% said they had considered going to South America, and another 8.3% had considered going to another country in Central America (in particular, Guatemala and Costa Rica were mentioned). Other countries and regions were mentioned in lower numbers, and 5% of those asked did not answer the question.

In the same vein, the survey asked participants if during the current year, due to threats or acts of violence, they or a member of their household had migrated to another country. 88% of those surveyed responded that neither themselves nor a member of their household had been forced to leave the country for those reasons; nevertheless, 12% of those surveyed (217 cases) reported that they or someone they live with had been forced to migrate due to threats or acts of violence. Participants who answered affirmatively were asked how many people in their household had been forced to migrate; in 41% of the cases one person had migrated, in 45.2% of cases two to three people had migrated, and in 13.8% of cases four or more people had migrated.

On the other hand, the survey asked participants if, during the current year, a child or adolescent in their household was forced to change schools due to threats or acts of violence. Every participant with a child or adolescent living in their place of residence was asked this question (1497 cases). Within this group, 94.2% stated that no child or adolescent in their household had to change schools due to threats or acts of violence, and 5.8% of those consulted (87 cases) did have to change schools for those reasons. When asked how many times they had to change school, eight out of every ten people stated they only had to change schools once, two out of every ten cases said it had occurred two or three times.

The survey also asked citizens if, during the current year, they or a family member, who had migrated due to violence, had been deported. 94.7% of those surveyed responded negatively, while 5.3% affirmed that they or a family member had been deported after migrating to escape violence.

Those surveyed were also asked if they knew someone currently living abroad who, if deported or repatriated, would not be able to return to their neighborhood due to violence. Approximately seven out of every ten people surveyed (68%) said that they did not know someone who, if deported, would not be able to return to their home due to violence, while three out of ten people (32%) said they knew someone in that situation.

The survey also gauged public opinion on the options available to someone who had migrated due to insecurity, but had then been deported. The most common responses to this question, which encompassed two-thirds of the answers, were that people in that situation could migrate again to another country (32%), ask the State for help (18%), or ask their friends or family for help (16.5%). Other answers were provided at much lower rates.

Another portion of the survey explored public perceptions of people who were displaced due to violence. The survey asked people to state to what extent they agreed with three statements. Over half (51.5%) of those surveyed agreed with the phrase: “This neighborhood would accept people from other parts of the country that are fleeing violence,” while people disagreed or strongly disagreed with the phrase at a lower rate (45.8%). Additionally, 2.8% said they had no opinion regarding the statement.

When presented with the statement, “People who are fleeing from violence and abandon their home tend to have ties to gang members and problems with the law,” public opinion was very divided: 48.8% of those surveyed disagreed or strongly disagreed, and a similar number of participants (46.4%) agreed or strongly agreed. In this case, 4.8% of those surveyed did not state an opinion on the matter.

In both of the previous statements, public opinion was not markedly inclined towards agreement or disagreement; this was different, however, for the following statement: “The Salvadoran State should create a special law that protects people who are forced to leave their home due to violence.” A high percentage of the population (92%) said they agreed or strongly agreed with the statement, while a smaller group (8%), said that they disagreed or strongly disagreed with it.

The survey also asked if Salvadorans thought the State should recognize the existence of forced internal displacement due to violence, and a large majority (88.6%) of the population agreed, while a minority (9.5%) disagreed.

Public Opinion of Extraordinary Security Measures and Perceptions of Incarcerated People

The survey explored public perceptions of the extraordinary security measures implemented by the Government since 2016, and public opinion of incarcerated people.

A majority, 75.7%, of those surveyed indicated that the extraordinary security measures helped the Government recover little to none of the territory controlled by gangs. Some 22.8% said the measures have recovered some or a lot of gang-controlled territory. 1.4% of participants did not provide an answer.

Regarding the restrictions placed on some of the country's prisons in accordance with Legislative Decree № 321, which regulates the extraordinary measures, 75.1% of the population surveyed believed that the restrictions did little or nothing to reduce crime. 23.4% think the restrictions helped to reduce crime a lot or some. Only 1.5% of participants did not answer the question.

In regards to the public's perceptions of incarcerated people, the survey included three scenarios to gauge how safe they would feel living alongside someone who had recently been released from jail. When asked, 87.9% said they would feel unsafe or very unsafe. Some 10.7% of participants responded that they would feel safe or very safe in this scenario. When the scenario was adjusted to include that the person who had recently been released from prison was a minor, 88.8% said they would feel unsafe or very unsafe, and 9.9% said they would feel safe or very safe. A third version of the scenario added that the person released from jail was involved in a criminal group. When presented with this scenario, almost everyone interviewed (95.9%) said they would feel unsafe or very unsafe, while 4% responded that they would feel safe or very safe.

The poll also asked participants to state their level of support for the creation of a law to rehabilitate gang members. 65.5% responded that they support or greatly support such a law. Another 33.5% said that they would support it a little or would not support such an initiative. Only 1% of participants did not answer.

Regarding the rehabilitation of the prison population in the country, 57.6% of those surveyed believed that “under the right conditions any person can be rehabilitated.” 24.6% agreed that “even under the right conditions, some people cannot be rehabilitated.” 17.8% of those surveyed agreed that “under the right conditions some people can be rehabilitated, but others cannot.” On a related note, eight out of ten Salvadorans agreed or strongly agreed that incarcerated people should maintain the right to receive visits, medical care, and job training while incarcerated. A smaller proportion of people said that they disagreed or strongly disagreed that incarcerated people should have those rights. With respect to human rights, 69.2% of those surveyed said that they agree or strongly agree that the human rights of everyone, even incarcerated people, should be respected. Meanwhile, 29.4% disagreed or strongly disagreed.

Regarding the implementation of harsher measures, or measures whose legality toes the line, - 65.7% of survey participants said they agreed or strongly agreed that criminals should be punished more harshly, rather than being incarcerated, to decrease violence in the country. About a third of participants (32.2%) said they disagreed or strongly disagreed with that opinion. However, when asked about whether or not they approve of the death penalty, answers were divided; 51.6% did not approve of it, and 45.7% approved.

The survey also asked participants about the level of security that they feel around the police. 56.8% answered that they feel little to no security around a police officer, while 41.5% said they feel safe or very safe around a police officer. 1.7% of survey participants did not answer the question.

Finally, regarding the actions of the police and potential excessive use of force, approximately seven out of every ten Salvadorans (67.9%) agreed or strongly agreed with the following statement, “This country lacks a police force that makes decisions quickly and efficiently, even if they don’t respect some rights,” while 30.9% of the population said they disagreed or strongly disagreed. Only 1.2% of participants did not provide an answer.

Regarding the potential use of torture by the police to gain information about organized crime, 53.9% of the population approved the use of torture, while 43.7% disapproved of its use. 2.4% of those surveyed did not provide an answer. However, when asked if they would approve if someone were detained by the police without sufficient evidence or proof of a crime, 77.4% of those surveyed said they would disapprove of the situation, while 21.5% said they would not. Only 1.1% refrained from responding.
